The Amateur Radio Service has been, is now and can be a very valuable future service to the public if the current level of regulations is maintained. Deregulation of the rules or to the radio spectrum itself will cause the service to devolve to a useless service, destroying what it has become today: a valued service during times of national or regional emergency due to disasters.